

The Survival of the Coolest

Its the sixties and the world is finally ridding itself of the rigid constraints of the past century, young people are living hard and fast, sex and drug taking is uninhibited. William Pryor is the son of a Cambridge academic and the great great grandson of Charles Darwin. He is a beatnik, musician and poet, hanging out with Pink Floyd founder Syd Barrett and drug explorer Alex Trocchi it is his first year of university, he is nineteen and soon a chronic heroin addict. This book is about survival, not the survival of the fittest but the survival of William, who was desperate to be the coolest. An addiction memoir, this is a harrowing, graphic, candid but also funny account of a descent into hell. Yes, William Pryor was lucky - born into a wealthy, intellectual and influential family. His great great grandfather was Charles Darwin; his grandmother, the artist and friend of Virginia Woolf, Gwen Raverat; but this privilege was stifling and bereft of love. This is the story of William Pryor and his addiction, how it began and how for twelve years he battled with a horrific and life threatening compulsion, which almost destroyed him. But Pryors book is also the story of his redemption, his return to a balanced, abstaining life of creativity and how it happened. This is the story of the gutter, dealers, fixing in public toilets, breaking into chemist shops - the seediest of low life. William tells how and why he would sacrifice anything and anybody to fill his addictive craving. This is the story of a young man who came back from the brink through what was then a revolutionary treatment system. Pryor is unflinching in his evolutionary analysis of the nature of addiction, of the prevalent treatment methods. As a long-time abstainer, he is highly critical of the prohibition of any and all drugs imposed by governments around the world, of the criminalisation of substances less harmful than alcohol and tobacco. But Pryor has a positive story for anyone battling their own addictions: the pain that seems to demand the drugs or alcohol can be transformed into a positive and creative force. Above all this is the story of how even at you lowest ebb it is still possible to pull through William Pryor is now in his sixties and has been clean for 36 years. This is a remarkable story of survival The Survival of the Coolest.
