

A History of the Papacy During the Period of the Reformation, Vol. 4 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from A History of the Papacy During the Period of the Reformation, Vol. 4

The plan which Alexander VI. had most deeply at heart was the centralisation of the States of the Church. It was no new scheme, but had forced itself on the attention of his predecessors. The States of the Church during the Middle Ages had shared the same fate as the lands of the rest of Europe; they had been granted out to vassals, who had tended to become independent rulers, and during the Avignonesse Captivity, Cardinal Albornoz had seen no better way of maintaining the papal authority than by recognising the position won by these vassal lords. The abasement of the Papacy, the Great Schism, and the Reforming Councils had still further strengthened the Popes vassals; and the restored Papacy enjoyed only a nominal sovereignty over the greater part of its dominions, as the power of the Malatesta hampered Pius II. and Paul II. When Sixtus IV. found no other object for the Papacy to pursue, he turned to the extension of the temporal power. But the entire result of his passionate endeavours was to form Imola and Forlì into a principality for his nephew Girolamo. The feeble pontificate of Innocent VIII. let slip all that the Papacy had gained; and Alexander VI., in a time when the air was full of political changes, had to consider what object he had best pursue. The French invasion had startled Italy, but had not kindled any spirit of national patriotism. The Italian league had fallen to pieces, and each state pursued its separate interests as keenly as before.
